Mosaic believes in building communities through education. It's a unique model for peace education that activates citizens by giving them the tools to recognize local needs and be agents of change.

CISV educates and inspires action for a more just and peaceful world.

Since 1951, CISV has been offering a range of local activities, international camps, family-hosted exchanges and community-based projects. These are known as its programmes and every year its volunteers organize them for young people and adults in over 200 cities in over 60 countries. One of the programmes is called Mosaic.

Mosaic believes in building communities through education.

Global learning starts with local experiences. Mosaic is a unique model for community-based peace education. It gives people the tools to identify the needs in their communities and helps them plan projects that respond in meaningful ways. Mosaic projects come in many shapes and sizes, but they all involve innovative learning and local impact.

It's a unique and flexible framework.

Mosaic is a project-based programme. It has specific goals and a set of tools and guidelines that help people design and implement quality peace education while also having a positive impact. Every Mosaic project in the world uses the same framework, but each one does it in a different way. For instance, every project sets goals in the three areas of attitudes, skills and knowledge, but each project will have a different set of these.
